

Please, do not preempt the Indiana Privacy law. I used to receive 3 to 4 solicitation calls a day. The worst were companies that I had discontinued business with in a polite manner. They force you to get verbally abusive before they will take no for an answer and then they call back the next week. I have an unlisted phone number, and I still can do nothing about companies (that "require a phone number", for say application for a credit card)selling my number. I will have to re-consider disconnecting my phone again if any of the phone harassment starts again. I am a grown college student running a household and do not have the time nor fortitude to put up with harassment of this type in my own home. The Indiana Privacy law has done me a great service and I do not want anything about it undermined or loosened in a federal attempt to control the horde of phone predators. They wish to take my hard earned dollars from me by ringing my phone off-the-hook and warring me down.
